Distant relative bequeathed him title about 1926-7; happy-go-lucky business man with many affairs until he married; wife (q.v.) is daughter of champagne manufacturer Henkell (q.v.); when first married, they moved to Dahlem, most elegant Berlin suburb, and became serious social climbers while he collected orders for champagne and whiskey from the embassies; Berliners claimed he promised young diplomats rebates on champagne bills in exchange for invitations; extravagant decorating of homes and embassies to please Hitler's taste; for a while was all for Russo-German cooperation, and according to Schmidt (q.v.), had terrific drinking bout with Stalin in Moscow; hated by most of his staff, even by those who owe him their jobs; acquired his two estates of Sonnenberg and Fuschl by shady means; relies on information obtained through own little secret service, which includes some aristocratic ladies of diplomatic set, among them the Princesses Wrede (qq.v.); Foreign Office also likes establishment of "Kitty" (q.v.) and her staff; still believes Hitler's forces will be useful to Germany, and sent special emissaries to watch them in Lisbon; likes to speak of Nazi propaganda in foreign countries as "social penetration"; close cooperation with Himmler shown in their joint use of Edit von Calea (q.v.), successful Nazi agent in Romania.
